Fy, obs form of Fie

Fy- see also Fi-

-fy (fai, suffix, forming verbs The older Eng. vbs. in -fy are adoptions of Fr vbs in -fier, which are added, adapted from Lat vbs in -ficāre or formed on the analogy of vbs. so originating (The form -fier was used as the representative of L -ficāre on the analogy of words like sanctifier—sanctificāre.) The Lat vbs in -ficāre were originally derivatives of adjs. in -fic-us (see -fic), though subsequently the suffix could be used to form vbs without the intervention of an adj They may be divided into three classes (corresponding to three classes of adjectives in -ficus see -fic), all of which are represented by adapted words in Eng (1) vbs. f. adjs. with the sense 'to make, produce'; as pacificāre (orig intr to make peace) pacify, edificāre edify, or 'to make or convert into something', as deificāre deify, (2) f adjs, with the sense 'to bring into a certain state', as sanctificāre sanctify, (3) f vb.-stems, with causative sense, as horrificāre horrify In med l. there was a tendency to substitute -ficare for -facēre in the few Lat vbs so ending, and hence Fr and Eng vbs in -fier, -fy sometimes correspond to Lat vbs in -facēre, as stupefier (but in pa pple stupefiant as well as stupefié) stupefy, Of satisfaire (but mod F. satisfaire) satisfy, F. liquefier liquefy, F. rubéfier rubefy, med L. calefācare calefy. Exc in the case of these few vbs the ending has normally the form -sfy (for the reason see Fic) It is now used as the regular rendering of -ficāre in new words adopted from Lat or formed on assumable Lat types, and is also freely added to Eng adjs and sbs to form vbs., mostly somewhat jocular in tone, and in the senses 'to make so-and-so-ified thing', as speechify, 'to assumilate to the character of something' (chiefly in pa pple, as countrified), 'to invest with certain attributes', as frenchify. (A large proportion of these vbs are from sbs. and adjs ending in -y or -ey, the suffix then having the form -fy instead of the usual -ify An early example is beautify, but the analogy on which this word was formed is not clear.) In a few cases the suffix has been quite irregularly added to vb stems, as mollify, verify, in other words either obsolete, as acetify, saundrify, orisfy, or merely jocular or illiterate, as argufy The noun of action related to vbs. in -sfy normally ends in -sfication, though, by confusion of suffix, petrifaction is used in Eng. where Fr. has more correctly pétrification The words in which -fy represents L -facēre have their corresponding nouns of action ending in -faction

The following examples illustrate the freedom with which this suffix has been used in the formation of nonce-words

1602 Dekker Satiromastix Liva, Nay by Sesu you shall bee a Poet, though not Lawrefyed, yet Nettlefyed so 1649 Trapp Comm Ephes iv 15 But speaking the truth Doing the truth Truthifying. 1775 S. J. The context in which the word there occurs seems to favour the supposition that it is simply fill-foot, meaning a pattern or device for 'filling the foot' of a painted window There is nothing to show whether the word denoted specifically this device as distinguished from others used for the same purpose, and it is even possible that it may have been a mere nonce-word] A name for the figure called also a cross cramponnee (see Cramponnee), and identical with the Swastika of India, the gammadion of Byzantine ecclesiastical ornament; it has been extensively used as a decoration (often, apparently, as a mystical symbol) in almost all known parts of the world from prehistoric times to the present day. G.

G (dʒī), the seventh letter of the Roman alphabet, was originally a differentiated form of C, for its early history see that letter. In Latin G represented the voiced guttural stop; but in the later period of the language it must have been pronounced before front vowels as a palatal, its representation in the Rom. langs. being precisely the same as that of Lat. I consonant (J), hence in OF. G before e, i was pronounced like J, viz. as the assibilated (dʒ).

In OE. the letter stood for four different sounds, viz. the voiced guttural and palatal stop (in this Dictionary represented by g, ǧ), and the voiced guttural and palatal spirant (here printed ȝ, ǯ). The precise distribution of these sounds is much disputed, but if we confine our view to the very end of the OE. period the following statements may be made. Initial G before back vowels was a guttural stop (g), developed from an earlier spirant. Initial G before front vowels was a palatal spirant (y) Medially and finally, G represented a guttural or a palatal, according to the nature of the associated sounds, in the combinations ng and gg (written cg when palatal, rarely when guttural) it was a stop, and in other positions a spirant. In early ME, or perh. in late OE, the palatal stop developed into the complex sound (dʒ), thus coinciding with the power of G before e, i, in contemporary French.

In early ME the continental form of G (approximately g) was used for the two sounds which the letter had in French, (g) and (dʒ), while the OE form ȝ was used for the sounds peculiar to native words, viz. the guttural and palatal spirants (γ, y) Ormin attempted to differentiate the symbol g into two, g = (dʒ), and ȝ = (g), but his example was not followed. The symbol ȝ gradually came to assume a form indistinguishable from that used for ʒ in contemporary MSS., in this Dictionary the form ȝ is employed for ME. words. This symbol was commonly used in ME for the sound of (y) initial and final, for the guttural and palatal unvoiced spirant final or before t (as in inouȝ, auȝt, miȝt, OE. genōh, āht, naht), and, so long as the sound remained in the language, for the guttural voiced spirant From the 13th c, however, the ȝ was by some scribes wholly or partially discarded for y or gh; a few texts have yh In the 15th c vocabularies the words beginning with ȝ are at the end of the alphabet Caxton uses the symbol sparingly, chiefly before final t The English printers of the 16th c. scarcely use it at all; but in Scotland it survived longer, and has left a trace in the use of z for ȝ in the spelling of surnames like Menzies and Dalziel, and of such words as capercailzie, gabercunzie

In modern English G has the so called 'hard' sound (g) at the end of a word, before a consonant or a, o, u, (exc in gaol, gaoler), and in words of Teutonic etymology before e and i, as in geese, get. Also in Hebrew proper names, as Gethsemane, Gideon. In words from Lat or Romanic it has the 'soft' sound (dʒ) before e, i, y, and at the end of a syllable, in words of whatever origin, the sound (dʒ) is represented always by dge or ge, the letter J not being used in this position The combination gn is sounded n initially or at the end of a syllable When the combination ng occurs in one syllable, the g is now silent, serving only to give to the n the value of (ŋ) With regard to the pronunciation of ng in the middle of a disyllable, modern usage is somewhat inconsistent: in the inflexions and derivatives of verbs the g is silent, as in singer, singeth, singing (si ŋər, si ŋəθ, si ŋiŋ), but is sounded in the comparatives and superlatives of adjs., as in younger, longer (yʌ ŋgəɹ, lɔ ŋgəɹ), and the other words generally, as finger (fi ŋgəɹ).

The combination gh is in a few words (aghast, ghastly, ghost) a mere capricious substitute for g (cf Caxton's frequent ghoos, ghoot, gherle = goose, goat, girl) Elsewhere it chiefly represents the older guttural or palatal spirant (OE ȝ or h), which in modern pronunciation is either dropped, as in high, night, through, plough, or replaced by (f), as in laugh, rough, tough; a special development has taken place in lough (lɔk).

II. Used as a symbol, with reference to its place (7th) in the alphabet.

1. G, g, g is used to denote anything occupying the seventh place in a series. (Cf A, B, C, etc)

2. In Music G is the name of the 5th note of the diatonic scale of C major, called G in Germany, sol in France and Italy. Also the scale, or key which has that note for its tonic. G clef, the treble clef (see CLEF1) placed on the line in the stave appropriated to the note G

P In the following passage the word is a literal rendering of the Gr κερδαίνω. The sense of the original is disputed ; most scholars, regarding the clause as qualified by the foregoing negative, take the verb as having, with or without a noun-object (variously extended) to obtain whatever good or bad (Johnson, s v Gain), so Liddell and Scott, also Revised Version (Corinth) Others assign to the Gr. wh the sense 'to spare oneself, avoid, save', so De Wette, Alford, Blass, and others Both uses of the Gr occur in Gr writers, it is not at all clear which view was taken by the translators, or whether they deliberately adopted an ambiguous term

Gall (gŏl), *sb*² Forms 1 gealla, 4–6 galle, 4–7 gaule, 7 gal, 6–9 Sc gaw, 6– gall [OE gealla wk. masc , a sore on a horse, corresponds in meaning to MSw. galle wk masc , MLG , MHG , mod G galle fem , Du. gal fem. , in Ger and Du the word has or has had (see Grimm Wb, and the Nederl. Woordenb) the senses 'pimple or blister generally, barren spot in a field, flaw or rotten place in a rock', etc. All these words are in the several langs formally identical with those repr. GALL sb[1], and it seems not unlikely that they may be actually identical; the notion of 'venom' (GALL sb[1] 5) passes easily into that of 'envenomed sore' (cf PERON sb[2]), the other senses illustrated below may be explained as referring to the gall as a part of the carcass which has to be removed as useless and offensive. The ON. and MSw. galle wk. masc., 'fault, defect' (in phrases equivalent to 'without gall'), seems to admit of the same explanation.

It is, however, prob. able that words of different etymology have influenced the s use development in the Eng and other Teut langs. In the Rom langs the word for GALL sb[1] (F galle, It galla, Sp agalla) was used for a swelling on the fetlock of a horse (as Ger Rossgalle, wundgalle, Eng WINDGALL), and Ger writers of the 16th c. argue that the word ought, being s transferred use of galla gall nut, to be limited to this specific meaning. In Eng the word seems to have been influenced (through GALL sb[2]) by OF galler, galer to rub, scratch, gall, possibly also by W gal Am., itch, scurf, scab (also, blow on cloth, silence Du gaaid, the source of these words is unknown, on suggestion being that they are derived from L galla GALL sb[1])

Gallant (gæ lănt, gălănt), a. and sb Forms. 4–6 gallaunt(e, 5–8 galaunt(e, 5–6 Sc galland, 6 gallante, -aunt, -aunde, 6– gallant. [a. F galant (recorded from the 14th c.), pa. pple of OF galer to make merry, make a show, (connected with gale merrymaking = It, Sp gala; see GALE sb.[2] and GALA). The early senses of the adj. in Fr. are: 'dashing, spirited, bold' (obsolete in Fr, but the source of the prevailing sense in mod Eng.); 'gay in appearance, handsome, gaily attired', and 'fitted for the pleasures of society, attractive in manners, courteous, poliahed'. The last of these gave rise in mod Fr. to the specialized senses 'solicitely attentive to women', and 'amorous, amatory', which were adopted into Eng in the 17th c, and are usually distinguished by the accentuation galla nt. The It. galante, courteous, honourable, and Sp galante, gaily dressed, sprightly, galan, galano gaily dressed, seemed to have been adopted from French The use as sb, which is recorded in Eng. somewhat earlier than the adjectival use, was adopted from Fr., in which language all the senses of the sb had been developed.

The origin of the OFr. verb gaier is disputed The view of Diez, that it was f the OHG geil = ME Golf, wanton, is now abandoned, as the normal Central French form on that supposition should begin with j, the form gaier (for which waier occurs as a variant) points to an original initial w Hence most recent scholars regard the vb as OHG waillôn to wander, go on pilgrimage, but the transition of sense offers difficulties that are not fully cleared up]

The Du synonym gleipot is not recorded till a century later than the date of our earliest examples of the English word, and the editors of Kilian's Dictionary think that its first element may possibly be identical with gies (frequent in the 17th c.), a variant of galeé GALLEY *sb*1 In support of this view, it is pointed out that gies-hoed, -hoedt, broadgies-hoet mean literally 'porcelain imported in carracks', and a passage is quoted from the Inv te Brussel II 206 which mentions 'glaes weres brought in galleys and carracks' (ghe les galeyen of carracquen aenbrocht). Further, gleyers-werk is explained by Kilian as meaning Balearic or Majorcan pottery (cf MAJOLICA) On the other hand, the word glet is given in Kilian and Du. dicts. of the 19th c. as a name for porcelain clay, but has not been found in any text, except in the compound glesbuiter, gleybuiter 'porcelain baker', and it may have been erroneously formed by misinterpretation of the compounds gleipot and gleiwerk, gleyaed (glazed pottery)

1 An apparatus for inflicting the punishment of death by hanging, usually consisting of two uprights and a cross-piece, from which the criminal is suspended by the neck Sometimes used as equivalent to CROSS See CROSS sb. 1
In OE the sing galga and the pl galgan are both used for 'a gallows', the pl having reference presumably to the two posts of which the apparatus mainly consisted Occasional examples of the sing form occur in ME, and even down to the 17th c, but from the 13th c onwards the plural gallows and its later phonetic equivalents have been the prevailing forms So far as our material shows, Caxton is the first writer to speak of 'a gallows', though he also uses the older expression 'a payre of gallows' Strictly speaking, of course, the pl form was sometimes treated as a sing much earlier From the 16th c gallows has been (exc arch in 'pair of gallows') used as a sing, with a new plural gallouses, the latter, however, perh not strictly obsolete, is now seldom used, the formation is felt to be some what uncouth, so that the use of the word in the plural is commonly evaded

6 A definite portion of play in any 'game' (sense 4), terminated by the victory of one side, or the recognition that no victory can be gained; a match at play [J.]

In mod use the exact meaning of the term is often determined somewhat arbitrarily by the rules of the particular 'game' concerned. In card playing, a 'game' ends when every player has played all his cards, though usually the contest is not considered as ended until a definite number of 'games' (in Whist, a 'rubber') have been played In some sports, a 'game' ends after a prescribed number of acts have been performed, or a prescribed number of partial victories gained

Senses 1 and 2 agree with the uses of the French word. The further development is app due to confusion with F garnison Garnison, which had the same meaning of 'defence' and 'supplies', as well as that of 'garrison'. There is not sufficient evidence to show that the last was ever a common sense of F garison. Godefroy gives only one quotation for it. It seems probable that the specially English sense of 'fortress', 'stronghold' (see 3), led to the identification of the two words and to the final adoption of 'garrison' in place of 'garrison'.]

2 The Garter, the badge of the highest order of English knighthood Hence, membership of this order, the order itself.

The institution of the order is commonly (on the authority of Froissart) attributed to Edward III about the year 1344 By the time of Selden (1614) it was traditionally asserted that the garter was that of the Countess of Salisbury, which fell off while she danced with the King, who picked it up and tied it on his own leg, saying to those present Honi soit qui mal y pense. The Garter as the badge of the Order is a ribbon of dark blue velvet, edged and buckled with gold, and bearing the above words embroidered in gold, and is worn below the left knee; garters also form part of the ornament of the collar worn by the Knights

Gas (gæs), sb Pl gases (gæ·sēz). Forms: 7–8 gass, 8–9 gas, ?- gaze. [A word invented by the Dutch chemist, J. B Van Helmont (1577–1644), but avowedly suggested by the Gr χάος (= halitum illum Gas vocavi, non longe a Chao veterum secretum Ortus Medicinæ, ed. 1652, p. 59 a), a Dutch pronunciation of g as a spirant accounts for its being employed to represent Gr χ.

Van Helmont's statement having been overlooked, it has been very commonly supposed that he modelled his word on Du geest spirit, an idea found at least as early as 1775 (Priestley Inq Introd 3) Van H's own invention the term Blas, which has not survived, while gas has been adopted (usually in the same form) in most European languages, viz Sw & Da Gas, Du & Ger gas, which was also employed by English writers for a time]

Gas is a far more subtile or fine thing than a vapour, mist, or distilled Oylinesses, although as yet, it be made more thicker than Air But Gas itself, materially taken, is water as yet masked with the ferment of composed Bodies 1690 tr Blancard's Phys Dict (1693) 99/2 Gas, a name used by Helmont, and signifies a Spirit that will not coagulate, or the Spirit of Life, a Balsom preserving the Body from Corruption. 1743 Lond & Country Brew II (ed. 2) 154 Your Water never is to boil, for Boiling irritates and evaporates the subtile, fine, penetrating Gas or Spirit

In the original OE declension was gat, gates, gate in the sing , and gatu, a, um in the plur , according to the phonetic law by which æ became e ex. where the vowel followed in the next syllable Subsequently the g (=y) before æ became palatalized, and the influence of the palatal x caused the change of æ into ea Hence there arose the forms geat, geates and geat , which are respectively represented by the a and β types in the later language In late OE the functional distinction between the two types was already disappearing through the operation of analogy, so that we find such forms as gates, gate (sing) and geatu, geatum (pl) , in Mercian the forms geatu, -um (with guttural) are earlier, being due to the operation of the phonetic laws of the dialect In ME the a forms are universal in northern and in north and west midland writers, and also prevailed in the s w (Robert of Gloucester's Chron Rhythm Legendary, etc), the MSS of Chaucer have gate in some passages and gate in others Since the 16th c gate has been the sole form in literary English, dialectal and local forms with y remain in northern and midland counties, so far as they have not been displaced by the influence of the literary language , occasionally they are found surviving elsewhere, as in N Devon and at Banbury (*Hall Dict. Gaud, *sb*1 Obs exc Hist. In quots. gaude See also Gaudy sb. [Of somewhat uncertain origin

Du Cange cites an Anglo-Latin document of 1415 which has gaudia (pl. of gaudium joy) in this sense. It does not appear that gaudia was so used on the continent, and in this example it is prob only a latinization of the Eng word At the same time, it seems likely that the L. gaudia is really the source, and that 'gauds' were so called as serving to mark the fitten mysteries (the first five of which are 'joyful mysteries') to be meditated upon in reciting the fifteen decades of aves. An A.-F. sense of the word in this sense occurs in a document of 1381 (Nichols Royal Wills (1780) 100) Cf also 17th c. F. gaudees, explained in Oudin's Fr Lt Dict. as 'prayers without attention' (Godef.)

(the -e for -a being a mark of Kentish dialect), f. gafol GAVEL *sb.*1 + gecynd nature, species, KIND.

When the meaning of the word came to be misunderstood (see 2), attempts were made to assign to it an etymology expressive of the custom of equal division of a deceased person's land among his male children; favourite explanations in the 16th c. were 'give al kinde' (Rastell 1557), and 'give all kyn' (Lambarde 1576); sometimes the word was written in pseudo-etymological fashion as gavealkin, gavel-all-kind. The application of the Kentish term to the Welsh and Irish system of succession led to the supposition that the word was of Celtic origin: a Welsh derivation from gafael to take, and cenedl race, family, was proposed in the 16–17th c.; an alleged Irish gabhailcine (from gabhail to take, taking, and cine race, stock), appears with the rendering 'gavelkind' in O'Reilly's Irish Dictionary]

1. The name of a land-tenure existing chiefly in Kent.

The name implies that it was originally a tenure by 'gavel', i. e. by the payment of rent or fixed services other than military, this agrees with the identification of it with Socage (quot 1293). After the Conquest, the Kentish form of socage was distinguished by certain customs elsewhere generally disused (cf quot 1702). Of these the most conspicuous was the custom by which a tenant's land at his death was divided equally among his sons; hence, even in early times, 'gavelkind' and 'partible land' are used as equivalent terms.

3. transf. & fig. A Welsh custom of dividing property, similar to the Kentish practice.

The Statutum Wallie, 12 Edw. I c. 13 recounts that the Welsh custom of inheritance differs from the English, 'eo quod hereditas partibilis est inter heredes masculos'; the statute sanctions this custom, but provides that bastard sons shall no longer be entitled to share with those born in wedlock.

Adams Diseases of Soul xvii. 65 A gawish Traueller that came to Sparta, who standing in the presence of Lacon a long time vpon one leg, that he might be obserued & admired, cryed at the last, 'O Lacon, thou [etc.]

Gawk (gɔ̄k), sb [perh f next, but see Gawk v.] An awkward person; a fool, a simpleton. Johnson, followed by later lexicographers, confounds this with Gowk, cuckoo, simpleton

1837 Hr. Martineau Soc Amer I. 209 They [his sons] proved 'such gawks' that they were unable to learn 1850 Mrs. Carlyle Lett (1883) II. 114 That barenecked hooing gawk Stewart 1894 Hall Caine Manxman 10 The girl was by common judgment said to report a gawk

Gawk (gɔ̄k), a. Also gauk [Of difficult etymology; app a contraction of a disyllabic word which appears in many north-Eng. dialects as gaulick-, galloc-, gaulish- (hand, handed): see Ray N. C. Words 1674–91 (E. D. S), Thoresby Let to Ray 1703 (E. D S), and the Whitby and Mid-Yorks glossaries

The natural assumption that the word represents an adoption of a prehistoric form of F gauche has grave difficulties. it is not certain that the etymon of the Fr. word had an l at all (see Hatz.-Darm., where it is assumed that the word has lost a nasal), and even on the common view that gauche represents an OLow Frankish walki*, it would be expected that an Eng. adoption old enough to retain the l would have so as the initial l

Gawk (gɔ̄k), v dial. U.S. Also gauk. [perh. f. the sb ; possibly, on the other hand, an iterative f. Gaw v. (with suffix as in tal-k, wal-k, lur-k), in which case it may be the source of the sb.] intr. To stare or gape stupidly.

1785 M. Cutler in Life, Jrnls. & Corr (1888) II 227 We do little else than sit in the chimney-corner, repeating over the same dull stories, or gawking at one another with very grimace 1862 Mrs. Stoddard Morgesons xiii. (1889) 68 The whole table stared as we seated ourselves 'How they gawk at you', whispered Temperance. a 1866 Keble in Sir J. Coleridge Mem. (1869) I. 111 Making one ashamed of going gawking as one is wont to do about the world. 1869 Lonsdale Gloss ,Gauk, to stare vacantly. 1883 Harper's Mag 708 Ayah's Tale I like to know what you call say if I went down thar and gawked around like you do up yere 1890 Gloucestersh Gloss , Gawk, to loiter and gape about.

Hence Gawking ppl a

1892 Stevenson & L. Osbourne Wrecker (ed 2) 237 Unmindful of the gawking creatures that struggled and died among their feet

Gawkish (gɔ̄·kish), a [f. Gawk sb + -ish] Like a 'gawk'; awkward, clownish.

1876 Whitby Cross & Down of Pearls xlviii 312 Some of the young women in these parts were quaint, gawkish, and from very shyness, awkward

Gemytrie, a form of Geometry

-gen (dʒen), suffix, forming sbs in mod. scientific use; ad. F. -gène, ultimately repr. Gr -γενής (f γεν- root of γί-γ-εσθαι to be born, become, γεν-άειν to beget, γέν-ος kind, etc. see Kin) an adjective suffix which has two different uses: (1) giving the sense 'born in a certain place or condition', as in oikoγενής, ἐνδογενής born in the house (respectively f. οἶκος house and ἔνδον within); (2) giving the sense 'of a (specified) kind', as in ὁμογενής of the same kind, homogeneous, ἑτερογενής of another kind, heterogeneous. The F. -gène in scientific terms has two distinct applications (of different origin) both of which have been adopted in Eng

1 Chem In 1777-9 Lavoisier (Œuvres II. 249) proposed for the recently discovered element (till then known as 'dephlogisticated air', etc) the alternative names principe acidifiant and principe oxygène, which he states to be etymologically synonymous. In G. de Morveau Nomencl chimique 1787 (prepared in collaboration with Lavoisier and other chemists) the sbs. oxygène and hydrogène occur, and are explained to mean 'engendrant l'acide' and 'engendrant l'eau', and in Lavoisier's Traité de Chimie 1789 the etymon of the suffix is said to be 'Gr. γείνομαι, j'engendre'. This etymology accounts for Lavoisier's original form oxygène, the change of -gène into -gène must have been due to the observation that -gène did not occur in Gr derivatives, while -gène, from the same root, already existed in hétérogène, homogène (ad Gr. words in -γενής see above); the fact that the suffix -γενής in Gr words was not capable of meaning 'that which produces' was overlooked or disregarded The names oxygène, hydrogène were soon adopted into Eng with the ending -gene, afterwards altered to -gen On the analogy of these words, a considerable number of new terms have been added to the common (French and Eng) vocabulary of chemistry, in which the ending -gène, -gen expresses the sense 'that which produces', they are usually names of chemical substances, as nitrogen, endosmogen, cyanogen, etc, rarely of classes of substances, as halogen, † amphigen

2 Bot The botanical use of gène was introduced in 1813 by Decandolle (Théorie de Botanique 210) in the words endogène, exogène, adjs designating two classes of plants which respectively produce their new tissue internally (Gr. ἐνδο-ν within) and externally (Gr ἔξω outside) The formation of the words was suggested by the older terms endorhize, exorhize Decandolle gives as the etymon of the suffix 'γενεια [sic!), j'engendre, je crois', app his -gène was not a new adoption from Gr -γενής, but a different application of the -gène already used in chemical terms, which he vaguely remembered to be derived from a Gr root meaning 'to produce, to grow' The adjs endogène, exogène first came into Eng in the adapted forms endogenous, exogenous, Lindley c 1845 formed from these the sbs endogen, exogen, and he and others added many analogous terms denoting classes of plants, the first element indicating the part at which the new growth takes place, or some characteristic of their mode of growth, as acrogen, amphigen, dictyogen, thalogen

2. Gram. Each of the three (or in some languages two) grammatical 'kinds', corresponding more or less to distinctions of sex (and absence of sex) in the objects denoted, into which substantives are discriminated according to the nature of the modification they require in words syntactically associated with them; the property (in a sb) of belonging to, or (in other parts of speech) of having the form appropriate to concord with, a specified one of these kinds. Also, the distinction of words into 'genders', as a principle of grammatical classification

In the Indo-European langs. there were originally three genders, the masculine and feminine, to which respectively belonged the great majority of nouns denoting male and female persons or animals, and the neuter, including chiefly nouns denoting things without sex But great numbers of words denoting inanimate objects were of the masculine or feminine gender, without even any figurative attribution of sex, and in some cases the names of objects possessing sex were of the neuter gender In Semitic, and in the Romance langs, there are only two genders, masculine and feminine In many langs the adjectives, and in some langs the verbs, have inflexions corresponding to the gender of the sb to which they syntactically refer Mod English has 'natural' as opposed to 'grammatical' gender, i e nouns are masculine, feminine, or neuter according as they denote objects which are male, female, or of neither sex, and the gender of a noun has no other syntactical effect than that of determining the pronoun that must be used in referring to it For common, epicene gender see the words

[In the Eng use in this sense follows the Lat use of genus, which in its turn is a rendering of the equivalent Gr γένος The formulation of the Greek grammatical genders in τὸν ἄρρενα τῶν θηλέων, ἀμφότερα καὶ θηλέα καὶ ἀνεννῆ is ascribed by Aristotle Rhet III v to Protagoras]

Thus the North American Indian langs are said to have two 'gender's animate and inanimate' With still greater departure from the original sense, the name 'genders' has been applied to the many syntactically discriminated classes of sbs in certain South African langs

2. Production by natural or artificial processes (as of plants, animals, substances, etc.) + Also, mode of formation, nature of origin (obs.).

In medieval philosophy, following Aristotle, generation (ydwesu) and corruption (φθορά) are often mentioned as contrary processes, together comprehending all the changes which take place in the universe. Hence the frequent allusive use of the words, e. g. in quot. 1611

II. That which is generated

The use of the word in senses 5–6 is largely due to the frequent occurrence of generatio in the Vulgate. Translators were probably uncertain as to the exact meaning of it in certain passages, as Isa liii 8, to which the following seems to be the earliest reference in English.

13 E Allst I^o A 827 Hys generacyoun quo recen con, Pat dyssed for vus in Iherusalem?

4 The offspring of the same parent or parents, regarded as a single degree or step in the descent of a person or family from an ancestor; also, in wider sense, = Degree 3.

In reckoning genealogies, each generation is naturally restricted to one individual in the direct line, without regard to collateral descendants

5. The whole body of individuals born about the same period; also, the time covered by the lives of these.

In reckoning historically by 'generations', the word is taken to mean the interval of time between the birth of the parents and that of their children, usually computed at thirty years, or three generations to a century.
